SPISODE V.

O sure was Perry Mason that he had downed Ilma and Harry when he descended upon them in his hydroaeroplane that he gave no heed to the lone fisherman who had heen an amazed spectator of the scens. Perry's machine gliding along the water engaged all the aviator's attention. He had started to rise before he became aware of the approach of the aeroplane which had pursued the balloon. With the trained sye of the airman Perry knew at once from the peculiar motion of the plane that something was wrong. He surmised that one of his shots had wounded the captain and thus made the handling of the levers difficult. LADIES' OLD VELVET HATS

Nor were they slow in helping him. The fisherman assisted him into the car and the four, two of them wet and weary, wrapped in a great coat, and the hird faint from loss of blood, were soon being whirled to the city, while howing to the circuitous flight of the balloon, was not far away.

To this appeal the vizier turned a deaf ear, and, departing, left the unhappy subject a prey to his fears.
